Report Description

Autoimmune disorders are the result of overactive immune response of a body that works against its own cells. There are around 80 clinically-proven autoimmune diseases; and in 2009 over 300 million patients across the globe suffer from these disorders. No defined reasons have been discovered to date for the occurrence of these diseases. Women are more prone to autoimmune diseases, constituting around 70%-75% of all autoimmune patients. Autoimmune diseases are mainly divided into two types: systemic disorders that affect several organs of the body, and localized disorders that affect only one organ in the body. As autoimmune disorders still have no permanent cure, more and more pharmaceutical companies are making significant R&D investments into finding treatments for autoimmune diseases, are also focusing on finding the causes behind the disease, which again are unknown.

This report analyzes and categorizes the overall market for autoimmune disorders into the submarkets for applications, products, services, and technology. The applications market is further classified into segments catering to systemic autoimmune diseases and localized autoimmune diseases. The applications market is dominated by rheumatoid arthritis (RA) under systemic disease segment; and by multiple sclerosis (MS) under the localized disease segment. These two diseases account for 75% of the total applications market. The other diseases analyzed under the applications market – i.e. psoriasis, lupus, type I diabetes, inflammatory bowel disease, and thyroid disorders – account for 15%-20% of the total applications market, worldwide.

Almost all autoimmune diseases are chronic and have no permanent cure. The drugs market, as well as the therapy and monitoring market, is growing due to the chronic nature and the wide prevalence of autoimmune diseases. The major technologies used for autoimmune treatment and drug manufacturing are recombinant, bridge therapy, DMARD therapy, topical therapy, fecal bacteriotherapy, phototherapy, and helminthic therapy

The product market is classified on the basis of autoimmune drugs, diagnostic equipment, and therapeutic and monitoring equipment. Drugs constitute the largest segment of the overall autoimmune products market. Some of the major generic drugs are NSAID, DMARD, biologic DMARD, Avonex, Rebif, Copaxone, Betaseron, and 5-ASA.

Therapy and monitoring form the largest segment of the services market. The technologies used in the treatment of rheumatoid arthritis have a much larger share in comparison to other technologies. Pharmaceutical companies are now focusing on the treatment of autoimmune diseases as these have no permanent cure. A number of government associations and non-profit organizations across the globe are also funding the R&D activities for new drugs and therapies to treat autoimmune diseases.
